1

Search on Google

Search Google for clinics, neurologists, psychotherapists, and family doctors in your area.

2

Call or send an email

Call the numbers, say who you are, why you're calling, and ask if they have patients with TS or if they treat this disorder. If they do—for example, in the case of a clinic—also ask for the specific name of the doctor who specializes in this disorder and write down the name of the clinic/office and the doctor, as well as the address and phone number.

3

Make a list

Number the entries on your list. You can always modify, expand, supplement, update, and adapt this list based on the discovery of new medical offices or the closure of existing ones, etc.

4

Create a map

Mark the locations of specialists on a map of your country with the numbers that correspond to the numbers on the list. This way, you can find them more easily.

Writing down the names, phone numbers, and addresses of clinics, doctors, neurologists, and therapists who treat people with TS or even specialize in them can be very helpful, both in your region and in your country.

Typically, there aren't many TS specialists. Therefore, it makes sense to find them and compile a list so you can recommend a specialist in the respective region when a patient seeks help and contacts your association.

This task involves a lot of phone calls and may be lengthy. Perhaps other young people in your association can help you. In Germany, such an "ICT map" already exists; you can help update it.
